HEMET GROWN

"This zone is more of a contradiction than any others."—Thomas

Why our location some 90 miles east of Los Angeles, about 1700 feet above sea-level, and only a few miles from the desert to the north and east is so very desirable—is hard to explain—is almost another contradiction. Of course we irrigate almost constantly during the growing season, and it is a pleasure to explain why and how that is a great factor toward well made-up plants. By constant irrigation the plants are kept growing all through the growing season and so are then ready for a well-earned rest at frost time; and it is safe to gamble the frost will "cook" the blossoms early in November, usually about the 10th. This method makes them grow all through the long growing season and then by regulating irrigation helps them harden-up, as seldom do our rains come early. Could better conditions be created?

In the winter time when our output is being harvested it is the coldest at daylight. This is taken advantage of by filling our Storage Cellars with cold air from the outside at that time with a large fan driven by a 10-h.p. motor. It is remarkable how cold this stored air seems during the following warm winter day, and easy to believe the plants are benefited when held under such conditions, especially so when you know many of the mornings are real frosty and mighty cold.

The dry desert conditions are favorable in combating storage rot and mildew. These favorable conditions are also helped by the use of finely ground sulphur distributed by the fan every 10 days. The fresh air and sulphur combined are wonderful helpers in our effort to create a perfect storage. And again, we do not have in our Hemet Production any black-spot, the spores of which play such havoc in all storage cellars when brought in with infested plants.

The first Rose Bushes are brought in shortly before Christmas time and all early orders shipped as directed. A constant effort is made to keep the plants "moving"—consequently they are in storage only a short time.

Eastern shipments are loaded into cars pre-iced in San Bernardino and forwarded to destination with vents sealed. This maintains good storage atmosphere to destination and insures against frost. Another step toward perfect service.

The concrete basement storage as protection against wind and sun; the fresh air from the 10-h.p. fan; occasional doses of sulphur; the best packing methods; complete boxing of all car-lot shipments; the pre-iced cars; the storage at car-breaking points; all combine to give you perfect service.
